

Hello, World!

I've been working as a software engineer for 39 years, and am pretty much burned out and ready to retire from that profession as such. So I'm exploring other opportunities of an entirely different nature (including commensurate less pay); part-time but open to full-time as well.

I have no formal experience working in the library sciences (so if that is a hard requirement, discard this application now, and apologies for taking your time). But I've certainly been a consumer of libraries, and have a fairly wide variety of experience in computer software systems; and I'm an active reader and am relatively literate in general. If you're able to imagine taking on a novice with my, perhaps slightly related, experience, then maybe there's a conversation to be had.

Thanks for your time. David.
